DO DANGEROUS WORK IN WATER

Natives Removing Piles of an Old King Street Bridge on Nuuanu Stream.

One can usually count on a native doing almost anything under the sun, and performing as daring and dangerous class of work as ever heard of, especially in the water. A large crowd of people congregated at various times yesterday to watch two old natives doing especially dangerous work near the King Street bridge over Nuuanu stream. The men were up to their necks in water, wading around among the rubbish that every storm brings down from the valley and lodges against the piles of the bridge.

Some old piles that formerly supported the King street bridge were being removed. The men had axes and saws and were hacking and sawing away under water in their efforts to carry off the piles.

As fast as the piles were removed other natives got bestride of them and sailed away, logman's fashion, with a canoe paddle as a means of propulsion.

A shipping master saw a native riding on two logs which he was guiding down the stream.

"Hey," he shouted, "can I ship a crew for you?"

The native did not seem to understand at once, but brought his log alongside the wharf and asked what the pilikia was.

"No pilikia; do you want a crew?" asked the sailor catcher.

"Not if all be like you," sharply responded the native as he got his log vessel under way again.

The natives will be at work for several days removing the piles, as it is difficult work to saw them off in the water.
